Augmented Reality

One big potential for AR is seen in the service sector. Its application for maintenance purposes can help to connect staff on the customer location with service experts from the producing company, allowing them to jointly inspect the product under consideration and develop feasible maintenance solutions, without forcing experts to physically travel to the customer.

The same approach can be applied when it comes to train local workforces in different regions. Through these approaches AR applications open up economic opportunities for small companies like startups, which want to sell their product around the globe and to offer decent services to their customers, but cannot afford to establish a global service network.

Challenges In Industry 4.0

Apart from effects on employment, the digitization of industry is likely to pose other challenges:

- Resource demand: Every digital device is based on hardware that requires raw materials for its original production. Due to the growing diffusion and application of digital technologies, the demand for raw materials is also likely to increase - opening up questions regarding their availability.
- Data security & privacy: One of the biggest challenges most often expressed by companies in association with Industry 4.0 is data security (Brink et al. 2015; Littlefield 2016). They are afraid to become more vulnerable to hackers invading their intellectual property as they have digitized their processes and connected all devices and machines to the network.
- Overstraining of governments with the creation of suitable policy frameworks: Digitization and Industry 4.0 are largely driven by actors from the economic sphere. Their pace often exceeds the speed at which policies and regulations can be formulated to govern digital and technology developments.
